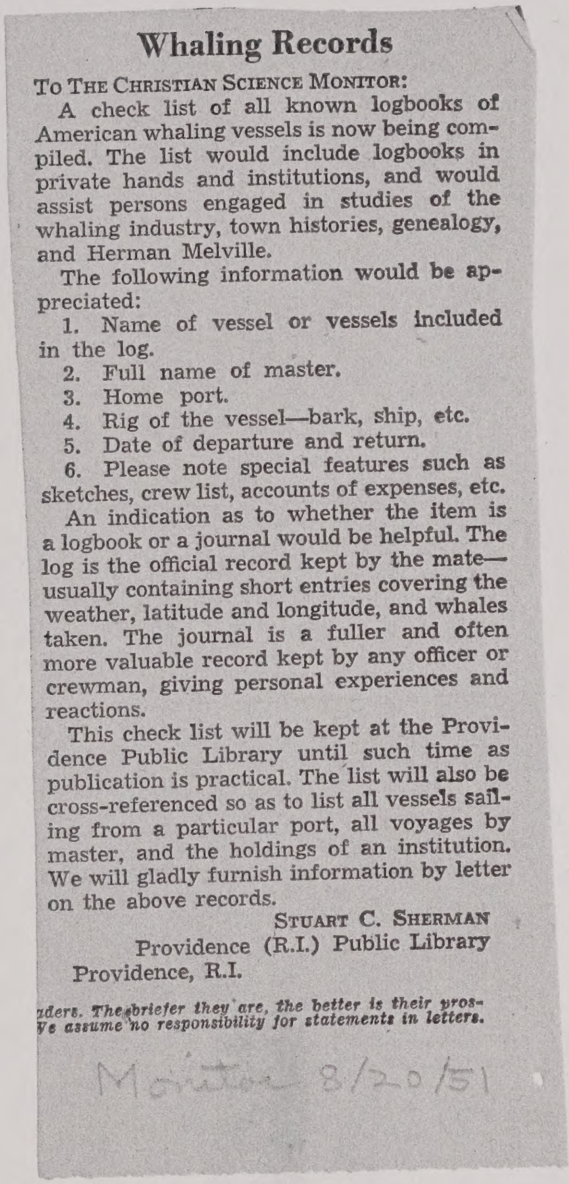
Dear Tony,

What is Bunny's address?



Whaling Records

To The Christian Science Monitor:

A check list of all known logbooks of American whaling vessels is now being compiled. The list would include logbooks in private hands and institutions, and would assist persons engaged in studies of the whaling industry, town histories, genealogy, and Herman Melville.

The following information would be appreciated:

1. Name of vessel or vessels included in the log.
2. Full name of master.
3. Home port.
4. Rig of the vessel—bark, ship, etc.
5. Date of departure and return.
6. Please note special features such as sketches, crew list, accounts of expenses, etc.

An indication as to whether the item is a logbook or a journal would be helpful. The log is the official record kept by the mate—usually containing short entries covering the weather, latitude and longitude, and whales taken. The journal is a fuller and often more valuable record kept by any officer or crewman, giving personal experiences and reactions.

This check list will be kept at the Providence Public Library until such time as publication is practical. The list will also be cross-referenced so as to list all vessels sailing from a particular port, all voyages by master, and the holdings of an institution. We will gladly furnish information by letter on the above records.
